N. READING 1 • The king in the parking lot

The king in the parking lot

Leicester is famous for its Indian restaurants, but the city also has one of the oldest histories in England. Its story goes back more than two thousand years, and in 2012 that story produced one of the strangest archeological discoveries of the century: the body of King Richard III was unearthed under a parking lot.

Richard was born in 1452 and died in 1485. He was a member of the Plantagenet royal family, which had ruled England for more than three hundred years. However, the Plantagenets were often fighting among themselves, and Richard's family was no exception. When his brother Edward IV died in 1483, the next king should have been Edward V — but Edward V was only twelve years old. Richard, who was the boy's uncle, wanted the crown himself, so he locked his nephew in the Tower of London and took it.

Richard was never popular. People said terrible things about him, and when he was killed at the Battle of Bosworth Field in 1485, he did not even receive a funeral. He was buried in a church in Leicester, but the church was demolished in 1538 and the ruins eventually disappeared under the growing city. By the twentieth century, the site had become a parking lot and a children's playground.

People never stopped looking. Philippa Langley, a British writer, believed she knew where the king was, and she persuaded archeologists from the University of Leicester to excavate. On the very first day of digging, they found bones. After many tests, the bones were confirmed in 2013 as Richard's, and in 2015 the king was finally buried in Leicester Cathedral — a short distance from the statue of him that had been standing in the gardens for years.

Today the parking lot where they found the king is a protected monument and one of the most important historic sites in the U.K.

O. READING 2 • The Terracotta Army

The Terracotta Army

In March 1974, a group of farmers were digging a well near the city of Xi'an, in northwestern China, when they hit something hard. Under the earth, they had unearthed the greatest archeological find of the twentieth century — the Terracotta Army. It had been buried in the ground for more than two thousand years, and nothing like it had ever been found before.

UNCOVERED. After the discovery, archeologists came to search the site. Led by a man named Zhao Kangmin, they worked incredibly hard for many years, slowly digging. They discovered around eight thousand life-size warriors, hundreds of chariots and horses made of clay, and smaller objects such as spears and swords. Because the sculptures were made out of a clay called terracotta, the warriors were called the Terracotta Army.

PROTECTION IN THE AFTERLIFE. In ancient times, emperor Qin Shi Huang brought the different parts of China together to form one country. In 221 BCE he became the first emperor of China. When he died in 210 BCE, he was buried in a tomb close to where the Terracotta Army was discovered. The emperor had lived in a time when many people believed in life after death. As a leader, he had made many enemies, and historians think the army was built to protect him from those enemies in the afterlife.

YEARS OF WORK. Work had begun on the tomb and the warriors several years before Qin Shi Huang died. Historians think that hundreds of thousands of workers were involved. The workers made each part of the warriors separately and then put them together later. Incredibly, the face of every warrior is different, and from the clothes they are wearing we can even tell their position in the army. Archeologists have also discovered that the warriors were originally painted in bright pinks, reds, greens and blues.

SOMETHING TO VISIT. A year after archeologists began to excavate the site, a museum was opened. Every year, millions of tourists visit it. Over the last few years, some of the warriors have been exhibited in museums around the world — so one day you may be able to see the Terracotta Army in your own country.
